Every day, Georgia Southern University President Bruce Grube passes the portrait of Marvin Pittman, Georgia Teachers College president (1934-41, 1943-47), in whose honor the University's administration building is named.

On the Cover

Georgia Southern's Centennial Celebration, which took place during the past year, provided the perfect opportunity to reflect and rejoice on all the University has accomplished. Thousands of faculty, staff, students and community members gathered on Sweetheart Circle, in the shadow of the University's historic core, to observe this major milestone.

For the pioneering founders of the institution, the first three buildings represented the promise of hope for future generations. Through six name changes in its first hundred years, Georgia Southern has steadfastly worked toward one purpose – to advance the educational and economic aspirations of the people it serves.

Growth and progress continue to transform the campus - from the expansion of Henderson Library to new student recreational facilities to the building of a new Centre for Art and Theatre. Following the Centennial Celebration of its many achievements, Georgia Southern moves forward to embrace the challenges of its second century.
